

Yehuda L. Klein, Ph.D. is Professor and Chair of Economics in the Koppelman School of Business at Brooklyn College, City University of New York. His research interests include environmental economics and policy, regulatory economics, and applied econometrics. Current research explores the impacts of green infrastructure on economic development, social justice, and the urban environment. His Ph.D., in Economics, is from the University of California, Berkeley; the subject of his dissertation research was "An Econometric Model of the Joint Production and Consumption of Residential Space Heat."